French President Francois Hollande has described the conviction of disgraced former IMF chief Dominique Strauss-Kahn as a "victory for women". "I am happy that justice has been done, that justice has been protected and that justice has been served," said Hollande during a joint press conference with German Chancellor Angela Merkel on Thursday. "But also, I am happy because I have great faith in women and I believe women can be bold," he added. The French leader said that Strauss-Kahn was "a person who almost, he almost... was a powerful person in the public sphere. "A powerful person who was able to do harm. "After all, in the end, this man was prosecuted for the crime of violence," he said. "Justice prevailed," he added. The "victory" was particularly sweet for Hollande, who was an unpopular incumbent in his first term. He was forced to resign for poor polling figures in the first round of the presidential elections in 2012. Strauss-Kahn was the Socialist Party candidate in the first round of the 2012 presidential election, but only received 4.9 percent of the vote. He later stood again in the first round of the 2012 presidential election in the primary constituency of Paris, where he faced a far left candidate of the Communist Party, Ségolène Royal. Strauss-Kahn was found guilty of attempted rape in New York in 2011 after a hotel maid accused him of
